And Here's Some Austrian Wine You Can Expect To Experience...

Austria's Grüner Veltliner has suddenly become the hottest white wine on everybody's list. Until recently, wines made from Grüner Veltliner, the most widely planted grape in Austria, enjoyed but faint praise. New vintages were served by the pitcherful in Austria's vinous equivalents to brew pubs called "Heuriger". Abroad grüners were known as pleasant quaffing wines best drunk young. Today, though, suddenly, grüner veltliner - pronounced approximately GROON-er FELT-lihnur and known in some circles as GrüVe - is the wine of the hour from Sidney to San Francisco. It inhabits vast sections of wine lists at bench mark restaurants, is beloved by chefs, and gets idolized by savvy sommeliers for its seemingly limit-less food friendliness (it goes with everything from oysters to osso buco).

Austria's Blafränkisch Unlike the regions west of Vienna where white grapes rule, reds dominate the Burgenland (in the east of Austria hard on the border of Hungary): Blafränkisch as well as Zweigelt, St; Laurent and others. But Blafränkisch is the best and most distinctive grape for the region, capable of producing racy, exciting wines of finesse and grace, especially when grown on limestone and slate. (quoting from my favorite wine guru Eric Asimov in the NYT). Blafränkisch, a grape that is little known outside its home territory Austria is hopefully making the same "Siegeszug" victory march as the Grüner Veltliner.
